

BILL & TED'S EXCELLENT ADVENTURE

Team 2 Presents...

Bill and Ted's Attorney Adventure

Exploring the Psychology of a Hyper-Competitive,
Highly Skeptical, Mentally Exhausted Profession

We've all met the classic Type A attorney billing long hours into the night ("Will do!"), stacking networking mixers on top of charity board meetings, all in the quest for kudos and professional advancement. Maybe it's even you, or used to be.

Lawyers can—must (?)—be skeptical of the information they receive, whether from clients or their superiors in the workplace. They want to know the "why," and they are often unable to simply accept a premise without questioning it. Research suggests we are inherently risk-averse. We are difficult to manage. We are preoccupied with recognition and prone to anxiety. We are fearful of failure, even, at times, in the face of great success. These all sound like negative traits. However, this presentation is meant to probe whether they are actually the features, not the bugs, of our personalities.

We will explore the above behaviors and discuss why this profession may attract them, as well as whether someone without the personalities we describe could realistically thrive in this field. We will also delve into the ethical implications some of these traits may have if exhibited in negative ways or left unchecked.

Ultimately, it is incumbent upon us all to look within and strive to understand our own motivations and idiosyncrasies, so that we may best serve both ourselves and those colleagues and clients who depend on us. It can be difficult to know where to start, but we hope our presentation provides at least some ammunition in the ongoing battle of knowing thyself.
